THE FLEMING WRECK

No More Deaths, But Three Cannot Recover—Incidents of the Fatality

A late dispatch from Flemingsburg concerning the wreck on the Cincinnati, Flemingsburg and Southeastern Railroad, where two were killed and 18 injured, says:

"Several thousand persons visited the scene of the wreck. No deaths have been added to the list, but Mrs. Harry Thomas of Covington, crushed through the hips and kidneys, is in a dying condition. No change for the better has occurred in the condition of any of those seriously injured. The unknown man killed has been identified as Thomas A. Fowles of Morehead.

One of the most striking features of the wreck was that the sixteen-months-old daughter of Harry Thomas, who was sleeping in its mother's lap when the train and trestle went down, was the only one of 20 passengers on the train who escaped uninjured.

The husbands of Mrs. Myrtle Wheeler and Mrs. Sallie Graham, both of Covington, arrived here Saturday from Covington.

Mrs. Susan E. Fant slipped and broke her hip Saturday while waiting on Mrs. C. B. Rankins, a wreck victim.

A corps of trained nurses from Lexington and Louisville arrived Saturday afternoon. Sam S. Bush of Louisville, President of the company, arrived Saturday morning and ordered no expense to be spared in making the injured comfortable. The Times-Democrat, a leading weekly paper in Fleming county, urges a rigid investigation into the cause of the wreck, asserting that the trestle had been pronounced several times unfit for use.

Those omitted from the list of the seriously injured Saturday night are Mrs. Amelia Snodgrass, Mrs. Myrtle Wheeler and Mrs. Sallie Graham all of Covington.

The best account of the accident is given by Charles P. Duley, Freight and Passenger Agent at Flemingsburg, who was on the train for a business trip to Poplar Plains and Hillsboro.

He says that he was sitting on the left-hand side of the coach, next to the colored compartment, and as the train moved out on the trestle at a moderate rate of speed he was looking at the trestle, which is in a curve, and when the engine, freight car and coach were all on the trestle, the end of the coach being barely on the trestle, he saw one of the beams of the structure give way, when the whole structure collapsed, the whole train being turned or careening to the right, all piling up in a mass of wreckage at the bottom of the ravine, the coach standing on end at an angle of 45 degrees to the rear and about the same from left to right."
